In 1917, two young girls named Elsie Wright and Frances Griffiths claimed to have photographed fairies in their garden in Cottingley, England. The photographs caused a sensation, and were widely believed to be genuine by many people, including Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. However, in 1983, Elsie Wright confessed that the photographs were a hoax.

The Cottingley Secret is a novel by Daisy Johnson that tells the story of the Cottingley fairies. The novel is narrated by Elsie Wright, and it explores the themes of childhood, imagination, and the power of belief.

The novel begins with Elsie and Frances as young girls, playing in their garden. They are both fascinated by fairies, and they spend hours making up stories about them. One day, they decide to try to photograph the fairies.

They use a camera that Elsie's father has given her, and they take several pictures of themselves with fairies in the background.

The photographs are a sensation, and they are soon published in newspapers and magazines all over the world. Many people believe that the photographs are genuine, and they see them as proof of the existence of fairies. However, there are also some people who are skeptical, and they believe that the photographs are a hoax.

Elsie and Frances are torn between wanting to tell the truth and wanting to keep the magic alive. They know that if they admit that the photographs are a hoax, they will disappoint many people. However, they also know that they cannot continue to lie about the photographs.

In the end, Elsie and Frances decide to tell the truth. They admit that the photographs were a hoax, and they explain how they created the images. Their confession is met with disappointment by some people, but others are understanding. Elsie and Frances are glad that they have finally told the truth, and they are relieved that they can now move on with their lives.

The Cottingley Secret is a beautifully written and thought-provoking novel. It is a story about childhood, imagination, and the power of belief. The novel is also a reminder that it is important to be honest with ourselves and with others.
