The Start of the Curse

The Chicago Cubs Billy Goat Curse began on October 6, 1945, during Game 4 of the World Series between the Cubs and the Detroit Tigers. A tavern owner named William Sianis was ejected from Wrigley Field during the game because he brought his pet goat, Murphy, with him. Sianis was a lifelong Cubs fan, and he believed that Murphy was a good luck charm. But Cubs management didn't share Sianis's superstition, and they ordered him to leave the stadium.

As Sianis left, he cursed the Cubs, saying, "The Cubs will never win another World Series so long as the goat is not allowed in Wrigley Field." The Cubs went on to lose Game 4 and the World Series, and the curse was born.
